

Don't be a Diya or Pataka this Diwali, just be you — Kusha Kapila's

At Manish Malhotra's annual Diwali celebration, Kusha Kapila stood out not only for her elegant golden ensemble, but also for a message she delivered with conviction. She encouraged her followers to resist pressure to perform during festive times. Her words: "Don't be a diya or pataka this Diwali, just be you."

Her appearance was glamorous, as expected at a star-studded event. But her message struck a chord. In a season often saturated with expectations, she urged self-acceptance over spectacle.

A Golden Look, A Genuine Voice

Kusha arrived at the event in shimmering gold — a choice that embodied tradition and celebration.

Yet, she was clear: her fashion did not define her value. Instead, she called for connection over comparison.

She used the metaphor of "diya" (lamp) and "pataka" (firecracker) — both symbols of light and sparkle during Diwali. She suggested that people often feel they must shine or explode to be seen. But she challenged that. She said being present, being yourself, is enough.

Her message wasn't preachy. It was a gentle reminder. In a season of curated visuals and high standards, she chose authenticity.

Why Her Words Matter

During festivals, many feel compelled to display joy, perfection, and luminance. Social media amplifies that pressure. Kusha's words cut through that.

She reminded people that it's okay to rest, to reflect, to not always perform. She invited the audience to let go of forced brightness and just exist.

Social Impact & Audience Response

Her line quickly went viral. Many shared screenshots of her quote. Fans praised her for highlighting mental health and authenticity in a festive context.

Some noted how rare it is for public figures to question performance norms at glamorous events.
