Barbara Palvin isn't letting injury stop her spotlight. According to an AOL report, the model confirmed she will walk in the 2025 Victoria's Secret Fashion Show — even though she's nursing a broken foot. Here's how she's preparing, what's known, and why this moment resonates.

Injury, Determination & Transparency

Palvin confided that she has been feeling nervous about pulling it off. Yet, her resolve is firm: she intends to walk in heels despite the injury.

Her husband, actor Dylan Sprouse, revealed that she broke her foot about four weeks prior to the show. He shared that although she's had to train carefully and privately, she remained committed to her participation.

Sprouse also offered public encouragement, saying “Break a leg... she literally broke her foot,” highlighting both the irony and gravity of her situation.

A Walk with Weight

Walking a Victoria's Secret runway is never easy. Doing so — in heels — on a half-healed foot is a powerful testament to discipline, professionalism, and courage.

For many models, the runway is not just about style but presence and confidence. With this obstacle, every step Palvin takes will carry added meaning.

Her decision also underscores an often unseen part of fashion: the physical demands, injuries, and grit behind the glamour.

The Stakes & Support

Palvin's return has been widely anticipated. The 2025 show roster includes veteran names and fresh faces alike. Her participation adds star value and continuity.

The support from Dylan Sprouse is heartfelt. He's publicly praised her resilience, calling her “the hardest worker I know.” That backing helps humanize the high-gloss world of runway fashion — reminding audiences that behind every look is a person, often battling imperfections.
