

Aneet Padda's Gown Transforms Pre-Loved Banarasi Textile

Published on 18 Dec 2025 | By IFI Correspondent

Bollywood star Aneet Padda recently turned heads in a stunning custom gown by designer Amit Aggarwal, crafted from a pre-loved Banarasi textile — a traditional Indian weave known for its rich silk and intricate zari work. This innovative creation marries India's textile heritage with modern couture techniques, reimagining a vintage fabric into a contemporary sculptural form.

Crafting a Sculptural Silhouette

The gown's design begins with an asymmetric one-shoulder silhouette, contouring the body with intent and fluidity. Aggarwal employs his signature micro-pleating and strategic cording, enhancing the fabric's innate lustre while reinforcing structure. A corset-style waist adds definition and elevates the Banarasi textile's radiant qualities without sacrificing its traditional soul.

A Narrative of Sustainability and Style

What truly sets this gown apart is its material story: the base fabric was upcycled from a pre-owned Banarasi textile, then reinvented through couture craftsmanship. By repurposing the vintage weave, the design not only gives new life to a cherished material but also reflects a broader fashion conversation that combines sustainability with creativity — showing that heritage textiles can find renewed expression in luxury fashion.

The Star Power and Craft Connection

Padda's look comes at a time when bold textile narratives are gaining prominence on red carpets and runways alike. As seen in other recent Vogue features, Indian fashion continues to blend traditional techniques with modern aesthetics, whether through actor-styled ensemble highlights or celebrities celebrating textile craft in innovative ways.
