

Stitched with Love: 91-Year-Old Woman's Knitwear Wins Hearts

Published on 29 Dec 2025 | By IFI Correspondent

In a fashion world dominated by fast drops, influencer hype, and designer labels, a quiet yet powerful story of craftsmanship has captured hearts and minds across India. A 91-year-old woman, confined to her bed due to limited mobility, has emerged as an unexpected symbol of fashion authenticity — creating hand-knit sweaters that have resonated more deeply than pieces from top contemporary designers.

Unlike high-profile runway launches or seasonal collections, her creations are born not from commercial calendars but from patience, care, and personal connection. Her son, Arunn Bhagavathula, recently shared her story on social media, revealing that she knitted a white sweater for him despite physical strain, frequent pauses for rest, and the meticulous unravel-and-reknit process required to correct fit and design.

Craftsmanship Over Commerciality

The story stands in sharp contrast to today's fashion industry, where speed and perfection often trump intent and handiwork. Her sweater — imperfect yet infused with devotion — struck a chord with fashion lovers and netizens alike, who praised the personal narrative behind each stitch. The piece quickly went viral online, with many users commenting on the emotional depth and sincerity woven into the garment.

Observers note that while luxury brands invest heavily in marketing and trend cycles, this handmade knitwear speaks to a deeper meaning of fashion — one rooted in time, love, and lived experience. In an era increasingly focused on sustainable and slow fashion, her art reflects values that many consumers now cherish: intention over instant gratification and heritage over hype.

A Reminder of What Fashion Can Be

Her work highlights how clothing can transcend mere apparel to become stories of resilience, memory, and human connection. It also invites the fashion community to rethink what qualifies as truly noteworthy design — challenging the industry to value craft over brand and soul over spectacle.

At 91, and despite health constraints, this woman isn't just knitting sweaters — she's reminding the world that the heart of fashion still lies in human hands and heartfelt creativity.

For more style updates & exclusive fashion stories follow indiafashionicon.com